

COVID-19 AND MUSE RESEARCH

As the pandemic continues to impact work and life across the US, research groups within MUSE are actively moving our work forward within the policies of our respective institutions. Many activities are on track, while some experimental laboratories and facilities remain temporarily unavailable. We are supporting each other, where possible, as the situation remains dynamic and the stresses on families and individuals are quite difficult for many. Since our research groups are distributed over a wide geographic area, circumstances may be different in our respective communities and institutions, but our thoughts are with each of you as we move forward with our efforts to obtain our research and operational missions.